Kawasaki city passed an ordinance with punishment against hate speech.

[point]

- first bill punishing hate speech in Japan
- Similar ordinances (Osaka city, the Tokyo metropolitan government.....) do not stipulate a criminal penalty
- the relation to “Freedom of Speech”?
- “dingnity”?

Kawasaki enacts Japan's first bill punishing hate speech

KYODO

KAWASAKI – Kawasaki on Thursday passed an ordinance against hate speech and, in a first in Japan, violators can be slapped with criminal penalties.

The new ordinance enacted at the Kawasaki Municipal Assembly, which will enter into force on July 1, bans discriminatory language and actions against foreign people in public spaces in the city. It makes repeat violations punishable by a fine of up to ¥500,000.

Research summary

My main research interests are in social and political philosophy, primarily related to freedom of speech. I'm interested in figuring out the best ways to reconcile a robust commitment to free speech with recognition of the strong case for regulating various forms of communication that are harmful to individuals and corrosive to societies. I also work on a range of issues in political theory, social epistemology, ethics, and applied ethics.

Teaching summary

I teach various courses in political and legal philosophy at the undergraduate and postgraduate level, on topics like free speech, autonomy, obscenity, censorship and liberalism.
